The Resources Agency of California, the California Environmental Protection Agency, the Governor's Office of Planning and Research, and the U.S. Forest Service, along with local government officials, business interests, environmental organizations, and members of the academic community, hosted a major conference last November -- the Sierra Summit -- in an effort to launch a consensus-building process for improving the management of natural resources in the Sierra. The workshop scheduled this date is an effort to continue and broaden the constructive dialogue begun at the Summit meeting, and will focus on three major topic areas as follows:

1. Information - identifying gaps in existing resource data and improving the accessibility of such information;
2. Coordination - improving communication and coordination among State and Federal agencies, local governments, and private citizens in managing natural resources;
3. Economic Development - developing strategies to encourage economic development and diversification, taking into account effects on communities and natural resources.
